All this madness is packed into a single-screen, pixelated game with no dialogue. Marty's Neverending Vacation A Very Short Story Marty looked at the briefcase in his lap. He didn't like it at all. He didn't like the softness of the blue leather, the sleekness of the white stitching, the delicate silver clasp. He didn't like the content of the briefcase, the body of his wife, Connie, in the suitcase next to him. She was so beautiful. She was the love of his life. But she was dead. She was dead because of him. They'd been so close. So comfortable. They were so happy. Marty didn't want to think of what she was missing right now. They were so close. Connie wasn't happy now. Marty could feel it. He could feel it with every fiber of his being. The only thing that kept him from total despair was the thought of his son, Ollie. That was the one bright spot, but it wouldn't last. He couldn't save his son, couldn't save his family. He was their only hope now. This case was a very important case. The biggest, most important case of his entire life. Marty had always wanted to be the best detective in the whole world. He'd always wanted to be the best detective of all time. But his superiors weren't good enough, and they didn't think he was good enough. They didn't think his name was good enough. They didn't think he had the necessary talents, the necessary gifts. They didn't think he had the dedication or the smarts or the patience. They'd put him in the wrong place, the wrong time, the wrong position. They'd put him in that car in the wrong place, the wrong time, the wrong place. They'd put him in the wrong place at the wrong time, in the wrong place, in the wrong place, in the wrong place, in the wrong place, in the wrong place. Marty didn't know what to do. He didn't know what to do. Marty wasn't sure if he could do it. Marty wasn't sure if he could do it. Marty wanted to change things. He wanted to make things better. He wanted to do the right thing. But he was afraid of what would happen. He was afraid of what would happen. He'd done terrible things. He wanted to make amends. He wanted to do the 82157476af
