Ballistics and Computer Forensics.Pillow Talk (British TV series) Pillow Talk was an ITV period romance soap opera produced by the company's drama department and broadcast from 10 January 1991, lasting for seven episodes. Set in a ward of a Midlands hospital, the show featured a love triangle between the young doctor, Mark, and his best friends, the publicans Liam and Eddie, who were also the sons of the chairman of the hospital. It is best remembered for its storyline about illicit lesbian sexual relationships at the hospital ward, which was later echoed in the much more successful drama EastEnders. Cast and characters According to Michael William, writer and co-creator of EastEnders: Loosely based on The Bill, and almost entirely set inside the fictional Midland General Hospital, the first episode opened with the main characters, fictional doctor Mark, working there, portrayed by Neil Morrissey, who goes on to be played by Alan Hughes in EastEnders. Mark is much less arrogant than Hughes' character, who was well-known as an arrogant wanker, a trait that Morrissey doesn't display. The show also introduced a number of patients, staff and extras. The ward where the series took place consisted of four beds, though in later episodes, when a bed was required for one of the characters for a love-making scene, a bed from the rest of the ward was donated for use. This allowed producers to continue filming without having to build a new set. The three lead male characters were Mark, Liam and Eddie, played by Morrissey,
