The smartphone will not be a device of the company that made the app. We are concerned about security, we are not willing to use certificates as the communication will be symmetric, so no certificate is required. Should we encrypt the data that we are sending? The application will be used for personal data (no medical information). A: You can read a short but practical introduction about encryption in BLE (and other protocols) here. As far as I know, if the smartphone is not your device you have to comply with the security policy of the smartphone manufacturer. Maybe this policy protects you from remote attacks but you will lose some features of the smartphone (such as access to the data stored in the phone, contacts, etc.). For example, in some of these devices Android security service is mandatory (see this question) but, as you said, you are not willing to use certificates. Furthermore, if the smartphone is not yours (and maybe not the one used in your tests) you should be careful with the data that you store in it (e.g. credit card number). I suggest to use BLE in conjunction with other protocols like NFC and SMS to ensure a greater security. Anyway, be careful and don't use security protocols just because they are trendy.
